You do not say that you applied any fertilizer to the peas and beans, and you took them off the land, and sowed rye without any fertilization. The mere growing of peas and beans will not improve, but rather exhausts the soil, for they draw heavily on the mineral plant foods in the soil. Then, in Eastern North Carolina, hundreds have come to the conclusion that their land does not need phosphate. The most probable thing is that the long use of acid phosphate has robbed the soil of lime, and it has become acid, and that a good liming to testore the alkalimity of the soil would show that there is a decided need for phosphorus more than other forms of plant food. On most soils the phosphoric acid in a fertilizer mixture is the controlling material, for there is in most soils a greater deficiency of phosphorus than any other element, except nitrogen, and, as we can get all the nitrogen we need through the growing and using of the legume crops, there is more need for can get all the nitrogen we need through the growing and using of the legume crops, there is more need for liberality in the application of phos-phoric acid than anything else. the soil grows poorer and poorer every and being in love with one's work has a great deal to do with its accomplishment. My good father tried to One man in North Carolina writes that he wishes to know what kind of fertilizer will make his cotton open better. He says that the land has been in cotton for fifteen years, and, of course, there is not a particle of humus left in it, and when the summer droughits come, there is nothing to retain moisture in the dead soil, the bacteria that work for the farmer such that the plant roots cannot get the food placed in the soil, and, of course, the holds fail to open, and, under the conditions prevailing in such a soil, it is doubtful that any fertilizer alone will remedy the trouble. The only thing is to farm the land, and stop merely planting cotton.
